

Diamond Drill

Out of the Past

January 16, 1925

The long talked of rabbit hunt took place after being postponed several times due to harsh weather. The bunny chasers gathered at Flood's Garage (419 Superior) with two opposing teams, one headed by Gust Lethin and the other by A.L. Flood before heading to the Red Rock area north of Amasa where they unlimbered and started pounding the swamps after a splendid noon "lunch". At the end of the day's hunt the two competing teams were tied with a harvest of eleven rabbits each and the contest was declared a tie. While enjoying a supper fit for kings an eagled eyed Walter Scott, upon close examination the Flood team's rabbit skins, determined that some of the animals weren't exactly rabbits. It was determined in fact that two of the animals were in fact dead cats. The Lethin team was declared winners with the penalties to be assessed against the Flood team to be determined at a future date.
